Investment Outlook

As we move into the final third of the year, investor focus appears to be shifting from the timing of interest rate cuts to the potential for a slowdown in economic growth. With the majority of developed market Central Banks almost certainly committed to lowering interest rates in the final part of 2024, investors are now wondering whether the action has come soon enough.

Whilst recent employment data from the US suggests that there is a slowdown, we believe this a concern primarily for those areas of the market that are perhaps overly extended from a valuation perspective or are heavily reliant on a buoyant economic backdrop, the recent performance of US small cap stocks being a good example of this.

The US economy remains resilient, with a strong job market bolstering consumer spending. Non-farm payrolls and retail sales both came in strong and manufacturing ISM ticked into positive territory for the first time since October 2022. The Consumer Price Index (CPI) data came ahead of expectations at 3.5% year-over-year (YoY) , while the Fed's preferred inflation gauge, the Personal Consumption Expenditures Core Price Index (PCE) remained at 2.8% YoY in March.
