Investment Outlook

As we move into the final third of the year, investor focus appears to be shifting from the timing of interest rate cuts to the potential for a slowdown in economic growth. With the majority of developed market Central Banks almost certainly committed to lowering interest rates in the final part of 2024, investors are now wondering whether the action has come soon enough.

Whilst recent employment data from the US suggests that there is a slowdown, we believe this a concern primarily for those areas of the market that are perhaps overly extended from a valuation perspective or are heavily reliant on a buoyant economic backdrop, the recent performance of US small cap stocks being a good example of this. We anticipate that, outside of a handful of names at the top of US indices, equity valuations do not look overly stretched and that with interest rate cuts expected into the back of 2024 both selective equities and fixed income can contribute to diversified portfolio returns.
